Do things always turn out the way we want them to? Of course not, but it's on us to accept them the way they are. As a student of psychology, I have had a lot of ups and downs, but, all in all, I am satisfied with my progress.

When I first came to the university, I was feeling lost as it was very hard for me to become adjusted to the new environment. As I had psychology for only one year in my high school, I did not have any special knowledge of this subject. I was afraid that it would be hard for me to keep up with the new learning material. Anyway, when some time passed, I got used to the new people I met and the obligations that were imposed on me.

I developed special sympathy towards some of the classes, such as cognitive psychology and basics of psychoanalysis. I was also glad to learn about different kinds of processes that occur in our nervous system when we speak, think and even dream. Not less was I excited to discover some of the magic that happens behind seemingly trivial, but also important things in our daily lives concerning what we base our decisions on or what happens in our brains when we fall in love.

As the material that we learn is appealing to me, I have no problem in getting good grades. Of course, I cannot say that it isn't stressful sometimes, as there are a lot of things to learn and by a certain deadline, but I sorted out my priorities and I try not to worry much.

All in all, the university has fulfilled my expectations and now I am studying what I love the most: the possibilities of the human psyche. Furthermore, I would recommend anybody who is interested in this subject to enroll in this university and continue developing their education and to work hard.
