

Are we too dependent on new technologies?

In the last decade, technology has greatly improved. Since the 1950s, there has been a constant fear about it, however. Now, when we have things such as computers and mobile phones, people are increasingly worried that everything will be automated and that humans will become lazy and dumb. This is just speculation, but could this happen, considering new technology capacities and robots replacing us in certain jobs?

No matter how much you love or hate it, technology is deep inside our society. Without it, everyone's lives would have been way harder: people's personal lives, jobs that require lots of repeated tasks, such as banking, police profiling, using databases etc.

But on the other hand, there are now robots in Japan that greet people in restaurants, do work on airports- they replace humans in many jobs we would never imagine they could. Of course, you can also get addicted to technology, but that is another topic.

All in all, I think that technology's usefulness surpasses its negative sides. We should embrace it, not run away from it.

Boris Stojanovic B2

M School of English