

Are we too dependent on new technologies?

Leon Jurić

In the 21st century almost everyone knows how to use a computer or mobile phone. You can even see 2-year-old children playing games on the phone. More and more youngsters are getting addicted to computer games and social media. There are those who spend 12 hours a day chatting with their friends. The biggest punishment is when their parents take their phones away. Pupils don't even read books anymore, they find it too hard and boring. Laziness and addiction are really big problems for society.

But new technologies have good sides too. For example the Internet is providing us unlimited knowledge about everything. Libraries aren't working 24 hours a day, but Wikipedia, the biggest library on the Internet, is different. You can use it when you want it and where you want it. We can also communicate with people all around the world for free. And if you are bored, there are always funny videos on You Tube to cheer you up.

I think that new technologies are good and useful when they are used in the right way.
