

Success

Hardly a week goes by without mentioning the word 'success' that has been used in different ways among people. For someone it represents the overcome to the obstacles in life, while for others it is a great opportunity to challenge themselves for something higher.

Shedding light on the issue of the success, people always tend to ask each other what is the right path to being successful? I would like to stress that people are divided into two groups: those who come to success by working hard and putting a lot of effort and the ones who become successful without taking any initiative.

First of all, awareness of becoming successful in different life fields should be taken into consideration provided that our decision to achieve some goals is much more important than any other. No one was born perfect and everybody has two main steps to success: discouragement and failure. Having taken the example of famous pianists who went through thick and thin, should show us that these people gave their best so as to become successful, but also honest. Despite losing hearing, Beethoven composed wonderful piano music which is used today in movies, series and even advertisements and gives us opportunity to conclude that hard work always pays off and it is inevitable.

Secondly, we should not neglect to mention that skipping steps also leads us to success which can be short-lived. Human beings are in favour of trying to walk the easiest way and achieve something inaccessible but they tend to fail on the way to doing so. Not only are people in today's world are unfair, but they also use certain methods that are harmful for the environment such as embezzlement or false enrichment. The more we are honest to ourselves in achieving success, the better outcome will be.

On balance, I tend to believe that success in life is reflected on how good we are and how much we help others because this is what should be the most present issue in our evaluation system.

Jelena Videnović C2

M School of English