

Taking risks makes life worth living

Life is a tangled web of endless possibilities that could have millions of different and unpredictable outcomes. Taking a risk can open countless doors for you but one wrong choice can also lead to total destruction. Some may say it is cruel to put such a burden on a single human, but that is also the charm of life. It is a unique experience for each one of us that no words could describe and with no right answer to our dilemmas.

Although terrifying, taking risks is one of the essential parts of being alive. Through it we learn valuable lessons and learn to enjoying the little things along the way. Without them life would be a straight line with no true happiness or any emotion whatsoever. Even when faced with failure we get to experience some of the most beautiful feelings, the ones that the greatest poets write about, which make our time on earth worthwhile. Whether sorrow or joy, these emotions that come with taking risks are what makes our life a bit more interesting and precious.

Where would the world be today if no one ever dared to do anything different and out of their comfort zone? Without risks we would be deprived of many great scientists and artist, such as Marie Curie, Galileo, Tesla and many more. All of their talent would have gone to waste, and society as we know it would never have come to be. It is through taking risks that we discover just how brilliant our minds are and we are able to evolve and create a better future. People often live in fear of being rejected and left out, so they never change anything about themselves or try new things. This human trait prevents us from growing and becoming the best version of ourselves.

In conclusion, as hard as it may get, taking an unconventional path is necessary for our growth and it is the only way we can experience the beauty and complexity of the world around us. The greatest risk in life is not taking any risks at all and living in regret.

C2

Topalović Tijana
Livingston Beograd